The Armorial Roll of Clan Strachan

The Lord Lyon's "Public Register of All Arms and Bearings in Scotland" originated by passage of the "Lyon King of Arms Act 1672, cap 47", legally required all Scottish Arms to be registered at the Court of the Lord Lyon.

These Scottish Arms would have been documented by "Letters Patent" so recognised by the Sovereign of Scotland (the Ard Righ), the Fountain of Honour, through her Officer of Honour, the Lord Lyon King of Arms. Many of the modern Letters Patent have been included in this paper.

Prior to 1672, Scottish Arms were unregistered and loosely differentiated among the various cadet lines of the family. These older arms, generally shields alone, have been found on various grants and charters, mounted on stone buildings, recorded in private rolls, and can be found on other sources.

Even after 1672, it was common practice in certain parts of the commonwealth, Canada for example, to use unregistered Arms. These are also included in this paper.

Illustrated below are the Strachan armorial bearings (Coats of Arms) as recorded in the Register of all Armorial Bearings in Scotland (the Lyon Register) along with other armorial bearing listed in other sources for those whose arms are not of Scottish origin.

These arms are a perfect illustration of the way in which all new grants and matriculations of Scottish arms try to follow and reflect the "chiefly" or "stem" arms. We can see that the Scottish Strachan arms are predominately based upon a blue shield and the main achievement with a very high probability a stag. Early medieval Strachan seals also frequently incorporated foils (flowers), which seem to have been lost over time.

History of Evidentiary Standards

The office of the Court of the Lord Lyon stands among the most ancient heraldic jurisdictions in Europe. Charged with the regulation of arms and the adjudication of matters of honour in Scotland, it has, from its earliest days, required those claiming arms to demonstrate a lawful right to bear them. Yet while the obligation to prove descent has remained constant, the nature and quality of that proof has undergone a gradual but significant transformation.

Early Foundations: Custom and Reputation

In the centuries preceding the modern era, the evidentiary practices of the Lyon Court were shaped as much by custom as by law. Following the Lyon Register Act 1672, which established the Public Register of All Arms and Bearings in Scotland, it became mandatory for arms to be formally recorded. This statute represented a decisive step towards regulation; however, it did not prescribe a rigid evidentiary framework in the modern sense.

During this period, proof of descent might be established through a combination of:

- family reputation and standing within a district;
- attestations by respected persons;
- earlier armorial usage; and

- such documentary material as happened to be available.

The scarcity of comprehensive civil records, coupled with the social realities of the time, meant that tradition and recognition carried considerable weight. The Lyon, acting as both judge and officer of state, exercised broad discretion in determining whether a petitioner's claim was sufficiently established.

The Nineteenth Century: The Rise of Documentary Genealogy

The nineteenth century brought with it profound changes in historical method and record-keeping. Across Britain, genealogy began to develop as a more disciplined and evidentiary pursuit. Within this context, the Lyon Court, particularly under the tenure of figures such as Sir James Balfour Paul, increasingly turned towards documentary verification.

This period witnessed:

- greater reliance upon parish registers of baptism, marriage, and burial;
- the systematic use of wills, testaments, and sasine records;
- a growing scepticism towards uncorroborated pedigrees and family lore.

Whilst tradition was not wholly discarded, it was no longer sufficient on its own. Instead, it became necessary to support such claims with tangible records. The romantic genealogies of earlier centuries, often compiled without rigorous citation, began to lose their authority in the face of archival evidence.

The Twentieth Century: Standardisation and Legal Rigour

By the early twentieth century, the evidentiary expectations of the Lyon Court had crystallised into a more recognisably modern form. The proving of descent came to resemble a legal exercise, requiring a continuous chain of documentary evidence linking the petitioner to a recognised armiger.

Key developments included:

- the expectation of primary documentation for each generational link;
- the relegation of secondary sources to a corroborative role;
- the increasing formalisation of petitions and supporting materials.

This shift reflected broader legal and administrative trends, in which courts demanded verifiable and reproducible evidence. Heraldry, though rooted in tradition, was no exception.

Contemporary Practice: Primary Sources as the Standard

In the present day, under the authority of the Lord Lyon King of Arms, the Court applies a standard of proof that is firmly grounded in documentary evidence. Petitioners are expected to demonstrate their entitlement through primary genealogical sources, typically including:

- civil registrations of birth, marriage, and death;
- parish registers;
- wills and testaments;
- land and legal records.

Secondary works—such as published genealogies or entries in armorial compendia—may assist, but they are not regarded as conclusive unless supported by primary documentation. The Court's approach aligns closely with modern principles of legal proof, emphasising reliability, traceability, and evidentiary continuity.

Conclusion

The history of evidentiary standards in the Lyon Court is not marked by a single moment of reform, but by a gradual evolution. From an early reliance upon reputation and custom, through the documentary awakening of the nineteenth century, to the rigorous evidentiary expectations of today, the trajectory is clear.

What has changed is not the requirement to prove one's right to arms, but the means by which that proof must be established. In this respect, the Court of the Lord Lyon reflects a broader historical movement: the transformation of genealogy from an art informed by memory into a discipline governed by evidence.

On the Representation of Seals and Armorial Colour

Seals, by their very nature, are impressions taken in wax, intended to authenticate rather than to display the full richness of armorial achievement. As such, they do not convey colour in the manner of painted arms, but instead rely upon form, line, and relief. For this reason, the seals reproduced in this work are presented in black and white, reflecting both their original medium and the limitations inherent in their preservation.

Where a formal blazon survives, and where it explicitly records the tinctures of the arms, the author has, where appropriate, incorporated those colours in accompanying illustrations. Such renderings are intended not as conjecture, but as a faithful visual interpretation of the heraldic description.

It should further be noted that the images contained herein have been generated with the assistance of artificial intelligence. While care has been taken to ensure accuracy and fidelity to the blazon, these images remain interpretative reconstructions, guided by heraldic convention rather than direct historical artefact.

STRACHAN, Hugh. A shield of arms: A cross pattée between four stars.

Legend: s' EGO STROCHOVN (?). Diam. 1 in. Record Off. Homage, 28 Aug. 1296.

This is recorded off the Ragman Roll, 28 August 1296. According to McAndrew, Bain indexes under Strachan. However, this is inaccurate, as Bain indexes under STRATHHATHE.

SAS and SHS both index under Hugh Strachan (Sp. Strachovn).

This Hugh may be descendent from Hugh, son Waltheof, who held half of a davoch next to Scotston, in the Mearns (St. Andrews Lib. 285-6, 286-7; RRS, iv, no. 4; and Arbroath Liber, no. 272).

People of Medieval Scotland, or PoMS, states that Hugh son of Waltheof, is, 'Almost certainly of the family of Strachan' (PoMS, no. 2073, archived 8 December 2020).

Hugh's arms are absent the traditional Strachan stag. Some have suggested that since the shield incorporates a cross as it's main heraldic charge, Hugh of Strachan may have been a cleric. Clerics, according to McAndrew, would have been compelled to sign the Ragman Roll.

However, Hugh's arms are entirely consistent with early personal heraldic usage, not necessarily ecclesiastical office. The seal is more consistent with a lay armiger than a cleric.

A seal matrix dateable to the 13th or 14th century was discovered in 2001 by a metal detectorist, P Nunez, in Foulden, Berwickshire, in a field next to the parish church and tithe barn. Adhering to good practice, the finder declared his discovery as treasure trove and the object was forwarded to the National Museums of Scotland (herein "NMS") for processing by the Treasure Trove Panel (COTT no. 08/01).

The National Museums of Scotland initially identified the seal matrix as belonging to STRATHEARN.³

A retraction was later printed identifying the seal as belonging to John Strachan.⁴

The surviving carvings and associated representations at Claypotts Castle depict the chief charged with three cinquefoils, accompanied by the initials of John Strachan. Notably, certain illustrations include horizontal lines within the chief; however, these lines do not form part of the recorded blazon. They appear to be later artistic additions or interpretative details derived from the physical stonework, rather than elements of formal heraldic description. The following image is shown at Claypotts Castle.

Year: 1625

Blazon: Or, a stag at gaze azure attired sable.

Source(s): None. Shown on various clan maps

The arms are presumed for Sir Alexander Strachan of Thornton, 1st Baronet (1625), and Sir John Strachan, Esquire (1740) .

Strachan (Thornton, co. Kincardine, bart., 1625; as recorded cir. 1740). Or, a hart at gaze az. attired sa. Crest — A demi stag springing or, holding in his mouth a thistle ppr. Motto—Non timeo, sed caveo.

The arms depicted above are attributed to Sir Alexander based on an entry in the General Armory dated 1625. However, no source is cited for this attribution, and the author is unaware of any contemporary rolls, seals, or other documentary evidence confirming that Sir Alexander Strachan, first Baronet, bore these arms. Furthermore, the stag depicted on the shield here, shown standing, is inconsistent with the earlier 1604 seal (No. 25), which clearly displays a stag trippant.

As the previous Laird of Strachan, Alexander, died circa 1601, the 1604 seal of S' Alexandrie Strauchoun is likely a more reliable representation of the arms used by Sir Alexander Strachan of Thornton, Baronet. In addition, the Strachan of Thornton line traditionally bore a shield Azure with a stag Or. On balance, the arms described in the 1625 entry in the General Armory are more plausibly attributable to the Strachan of Inchtuthill line.

Burke's General Armory does not in itself establish that arms were formally granted or matriculated by a heraldic authority. Burke's compilation, first published in the nineteenth century, drew upon a wide range of sources, including family submissions, manuscript armorials, printed genealogies, funeral certificates, and long-established usage. It was not an official register of grants, nor did it systematically verify each entry against the records of the Court of the Lord Lyon or the College of Arms. Arms might therefore be recorded in the General Armory on the basis of tradition, assumption, or unproven pedigree, even where no surviving patent of arms exists in Edinburgh, London, or elsewhere. In some cases, the original grant may have been lost; in others the arms may never have been formally authorised but were borne by custom and later accepted by compilers. Inclusion in Burke confirms attribution and contemporary recognition of usage, but it does not of itself constitute proof of lawful heraldic authority under either the Scottish or English systems.

A later matriculation by the Court of the Lord Lyon in 1765 states that Capt. Sir John Strachan, Baronet, was the nephew of Thomas Strachan of Inchtuthill, who was "knighted in May 1685."

Transcription of the Lyon Register (1765)

Sir John Strachan Capt. of the Royal Navy eldest son of Doctor Patrick Strachan of the Royal Navy, nephew and heir of Thomas Strachan of Inchtuthill, Bart. Who was knighted on May 1685. Bears Or, a hart standing at gaze Azure, attired sable, within a bordure Gules: Crest: A demi-stag springing Or, holding a thistle in its mouth, proper. Motto: Non Timeo Sed Caveo. Made 25 April 1765. No 125.

The author, in correspondence with the College of Arms in London, received confirmation from Phillip Bone, Rouge Dragon Pursuivant, in an email dated 9 February 2026 that no grant dated 1685 exists in the College records to any Strachan, Baronet, (Thomas) or otherwise. However, the same communication confirmed that the College of Arms had a record for Sir Richard-John Strachan, Baronet, Rear Admiral of the Blue, who was granted augmentations to his arms and crest in 1810, recorded in College of Arms Grants 25/359.

'In that instrument the unaugmented arms are first described as Or, a stag trippant Azure attired Sable within a bordure Gules, to which was added a canton Azure charged with a cross Gules fimbriated Argent between four ships under sail proper. The crest, originally a demi stag Or holding in its mouth a thistle proper, was augmented to issue from a naval crown Or. The description supplied by the Rouge Dragon Pursuivant refers simply to a demi stag Or holding in its mouth a thistle proper.'

Of relevance here, Sir Richard's stag is a trippant, while his uncle, Captain Sir John Strachan's stag is standing at gaze.

The Rouge Dragon Pursuivant further observed:

'The fact that the blazons of the unaugmented Arms and Crest are given in the text suggests that it is likely that the heralds of the early nineteenth century also found no grant to an ancestor of Sir Richard John Strachan, and thus took the opportunity of the grant of augmentations to confirm the basic design retroactively. The caveat is that 1685 is just around the date at which grant records at the College become significantly more thorough. I cannot absolutely rule out that Sir Richard John Strachan was in fact able to show the heralds of his day a now lost patent granting the unaugmented Arms to his ancestor.'

It is noteworthy that certain features of the unaugmented arms of Sir Richard appear to bear comparison with those granted in 1765 by the Court of the Lord Lyon to his uncle, Sir John Strachan. Captain Strachan's crest was blazoned as a demi stag springing Or, holding in its mouth a thistle proper. The inclusion of the term 'springing' in the Lyon grant, in contrast to its absence in the College description, may be of interpretative significance in the heraldic representation of the crest.

The author sent a second email to the College of Arms, London, seeking confirmation of the difference in the crest, and as of the publication date has not received a response.

The arms as shown below, in Rogers, Memorials of the Scottish Families of Strachan and Wise (1873), include four features not specified in the 1810 College grant.¹³

Among these are the greyhound supporters bearing circular badges suspended from their collars. On close examination, these roundels appear consistent with the design of the Naval Gold Medal awarded during the Napoleonic Wars. Sir Richard (and his captains) received the Naval Gold Medal for his action against the French squadron off Cape Ortegal on 4 November 1805.¹⁴ While campaign medals were not formally incorporated into grants of arms, nineteenth-century heraldic engravings sometimes depicted personal honours as part of a commemorative achievement. The badges, therefore, appear to represent his naval distinction.

The upper scroll bearing the motto, "Non Timeo Sed Caveo," is not mentioned in the College of Arms.

The lower scroll bears the phrase "Veni, Vide, Vinci", evidently intended as a variant of the classical "Veni, Vidi, Vici", traditionally attributed to Julius Caesar after the Battle of Zela in 47 BC, meaning "I came, I saw, I conquered." Whether the altered form reflects an engraving error or deliberate variation remains uncertain.

The red garter, or circlet surrounding the shield and inscribed Tria juncta in uno represents the Most Honourable Order of the Bath. This motto, meaning "Three joined in one", refers to the union of England, Scotland and Ireland under a single Crown and became the fixed motto of the Order when it was reconstituted in 1725. The presence of the circlet signifies that Sir Richard Strachan was a Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath, a distinction reflecting his recognised service and standing within the British honours system.

Whether Sir Richard habitually used the arms as depicted in Rogers, with their commemorative additions, or confined himself to the form recorded in the College of Arms grant of 1810 cannot now be determined with certainty. The engraved achievement may represent a memorial or celebratory rendering rather than a strictly regulated heraldic display. The divergence between the College record and the later engraving illustrates the distinction between formally granted arms and their subsequent artistic or commemorative interpretation.

According to David Butler, author of Bishop John Strachan and Heraldry in the University of Trinity College, Toronto, "He [Bishop Strachan] assumed Arms as first Anglican Bishop of Toronto, and were properly impaled with those of the Diocese of Toronto all within a bordure Or. Here the bordure is used as a charge not as a mark of cadence as in Scottish heraldry".

Bishop Strachan's Arms were not registered nor were those of the second (Bethune), third (Sweatman) and fourth (Sweeny) successive Anglican Bishops of Toronto during the period between 1839- 1940.

Dr. Butler states that the use of unregistered Arms was a common practice in early Canada. A Canadian Heraldic Authority was not established until 1988.

Alexander Strachan of Thornton Aberdeen

Folio 99 LCA64

Alexander Strachan or Strathauchin, to give the full spelling, of Thornton was born about 1545, the son of John by his wife (conjoint charter 31 March 1543) Margaret daughter of Alexander Livingstone of Dunipace. He seems to have acquired more lands, from the church, and also held of the Earl of Huntly. He married Isobel daughter of William Keith, 4th Earl Marischal (Test 2 Aug 1597). His son Robert predeceased him, having had by his wife (MC 4&5 April 1586) Sara daughter of William Douglas of Glenbervie, later Earl of Angus, two sons Alexander and Thomas. Robert had at least two brothers, John of Phasdo who was tutor to his nephew Alexander, and George, presumably the George Strachan who was Tapisier to the King 1582–1603, also one sister Margaret, who married (conjoint grant 19 March 1594) William Turing of Foveran. Robert's son Alexander was served heir to his grandfather 30 September 1606. Alexander was married twice, firstly (MC 19 January 1605) to Margaret daughter of John Lindsay Lord Menmuir, 2nd son of David 9th Earl of Crawford (qv sub Lindsay of Edzell) and secondly before 20 January 1624 to Margaret widow of George Keith, 5th Earl Marischal and daughter of James 5th Lord Ogilvie of Airlie. He was knighted between 1616 and 1618. In 1625 he was created a Baronet of Nova Scotia, with precedence of all baronets save Sir Robert Gordon of Gordonston. He was a member of the Board of the Exchequer of Scotland and was appointed to the first of a number of Royal Commissions in 1626. He had a remission with other family members for removing to the house of James Keith of Benholme, his stepson, eldest son by the second marriage of George 4th Earl Marischal, "cistas, scripta, gemmas, aurum, argentums et alia" (chests, charters, jewels, gold, silver and other things) which belonged to the Earl Marischal. The remission is to all involved in the fracas, irrespective of which part they took. He fell foul of the Commonwealth administration and was alive still in 1657, when Thomas Allardice seems to have acquired the bulk of, if not all, his lands. His testament was proved 24 January 1662 (Edin); there is also a testament proved 14 October 1656 (St Andrews) for Euphame Straquhan, Lady Thornton, probably a third wife. He had, necessarily by Margaret Lindsay, a single son Alexander, who married (conjoint confirmation of grant from Sir Alexander 1 August 1635) Elizabeth Douglas. On the expiry of this line the baronetcy was adopted by a fairly distant cousin, who is called Sir James Strachan of Thornton in 1663.
